Battling problems one by one, a hero's work is never done.

Denver Colorado, January 2008. Announcing Dramatic Adventures Super Hero Academy weeklong spring break and summer camps for youngsters ages 4-8. Students develop original secret identities, costumes and problem solving skills. Interactive theatre has never been so fun, or more productive as students learn and practice dramatic powers every hero needs. A fast talking robot helps heroes in training learn the power of listening. The Anti-Super-Hero-Gaseous-Cloud-Bird helps children develop super human sight and the power of close observation. Practical problem solving skills are used to battle every day challenges and overcome extraordinary obstacles.

“Children need strategic thinking skills to address problems particularly during these early stages when a child’s identity is forming. When children have viable tools to affect their experiences, self-esteem are strengthened,” says Diana Brittain Thompson, Founder of Dramatic Adventures. “With the challenges of the teen years to come, these cannot be strong enough. In the Academy we work to produce results by helping students role play the powerful person they wish to become.” Diana has 25 years experience in developing and delivering original theatre programs for schools and cultural institutions. She is a New York trained actress and writer.

Parent Carrie T. said of Super Hero Academy, “Elie LOVED this class- it was the first thing he said in the morning. I saw immediate change in how he applied the information in daily situations – often all he needed was a reminder from me to be a super hero. This [program] is a most amazing service.”

Dramatic Adventures offers classes year around in critical skills development using theatre. Fairytales and Feelings, the company’s flagship program, is a parent/child class teaching emotional intelligence skills. Classes are available for the general public, schools and organizations.
